In 1993, I quit my job as an associate pastor before my senior pastor could fire me. I hadn't begun teaching heterodox doctrine or engaged in a sexual affair or some other moral failure. No, I had vociferously challenged the seeker-sensitive direction he was taking the church. As a 24-year-old seminary student, I felt I knew a lot more about ministry than my pastor did, and I wasn't hesitant to download my knowledge on him. Needless to say, this frustrated him personally and hampered the church's evangelistic ministry. At a tense lunch meeting, my pastor told me I needed to shape up or ship out, so I tendered my resignation and left. At the time, I thought my quitting was a matter of principle. I realized later, however, that it was really a manifestation of emotional unhealthiness. I was young and immature but working in a missional environment that required a spiritual grownup. Several years of apprenticeship at a more traditional church, combined with two yearsâ™ work in corporate America, wised me up and mellowed me out. In 1999, Iâ™m happy to say, I returned to work for the pastor who had wanted to fire me, and I count those years as some of the best of my career.âœThe emotionally unhealthy leader,â• Peter Scazzero writes in his new book, âœis someone who operates in a continuous state of emotional and spiritual deficit, lacking emotional maturity and a â^being with Godâ™ sufficient to sustain their â^doing for God.â™â• That described me to a tee back then. I was thinking too much and feeling too little, reading too much and praying too little, reflecting on âœbig ideasâ• too much and relating to others too little. My life was out of balance, which meant my ministry was out of balance too.
